Category:Forensics softwareDiodor/Getty Images It has been five years since Apple unveiled the first iPhone, and its journey across the world since then has been a bumpy one. Its attempts to reach a price-point that would make it accessible to the masses and its success on that front have been largely mixed. Despite rumours of Apple poaching key employees from rivals and leaking details of products that may or may not have been ready for release, the company has clung to its cult-like status with only a few niggles. Yet even as it's celebrating its 10th birthday, there are also reasons to be concerned. Apple now wants to be a services company, and it doesn't want to be a "chicken" any more. Why now? Apple's been building its "services" strategy for quite some time. In June 2016, it announced Apple Music, its answer to Spotify and other music streaming services. Then, a year later, it took the wraps off of Apple News, which was built to make people's news - or at least their curated news - a bit more palatable. As it began to work on its smartwatch with the aim of making it come alive when users needed it most, the company also began to focus on personalisation. Facebook and other social platforms had long existed as one of the main ways people could connect with others, but technology such as voice synthesis and other natural language processing made it much easier to carry on conversation online. Apple needed to catch up. So, it chose to make its smartwatch and then to finally, finally show off a TV that could (and would) curate a user's videos. And then it brought its revamp of its music service, putting us through the emotional storm of losing the iconic "2" button and seeing the company absent at the iTunes Music Awards. The smartwatch was viewed as the true beginning of its services push, but in the years since, the company has been working to make its own ambitions more mainstream. Apple's car, for instance, now allows drivers to play their own music through the dashboard speakers, and Apple is promising a digital assistant for smart homes. And with the launch of Apple TV+, it is now making a commitment to its content. It's owned a few prestige brands in the past, including the App Store and iTunes Store (now iTunes in the App Store). But by owning more content than anyone else f678ea9f9e
